

Timekeeping obligations in the workplace

DURABLE fact check: what companies now need to do

The obligation to record working time is mandatory in Germany. That means it's now high time to take action. From this year, companies have to fully track the time worked by each employee regardless of where they work and how flexible their working hours are. Even though the Federal Ministry of Labour has not yet released detailed information on exceptions that might exist and which form the documentation should take, significant cornerstones already apply. What do companies need to do now? The modern work expert DURABLE has compiled the most important facts.

If you don't yet have a timekeeping system, setting one up doesn't have to be complicated. If the company already has a controlled entry system that uses key cards, a timekeeping system can be linked to it. And so that the required ID cards are well protected and always to hand, DURABLE offers various ID card holders with practical attachment options. For example, attached to a badge reel or a lanyard, ID cards can be easily presented to the scanner and won't be lost at the bottom of bags.

TIMEKEEPING OBLIGATIONS IN THE WORKPLACE

Graphic:
DURABLE